World Register of Marine Species flavescens Category:Gastropods described in 1991 Long-term exposure to tritium-contaminated drinking water causes histological changes in the skeletal muscle of Japanese quail. As part of a large scale experiment, Japanese quail were exposed to tritium-contaminated drinking water at the rate of 0.18 to 0.78 mBq L⁻¹ for up to 22 months. At necropsy, the skeleton and other tissues were examined for signs of abnormal growth and development. The skeletal muscle of birds exposed to tritium for 4 months or more was examined histologically. Increased plasma tritium concentrations were observed from 6 weeks to 22 months of age. In the growing stages, the mean activity concentration of tritium in plasma was 10.0 +/- 2.2 Bq L⁻¹ at 22 months of age, whereas no tritium was detected in a control group (0.4 +/- 0.1 Bq L⁻¹). The tritium concentration in the leg muscle of birds exposed to tritium ranged from approximately 0.1 to 0.4 Bq kg⁻¹ (dry weight). No significant difference in myofiber diameter or fiber type was observed in the leg muscle of birds exposed to tritium for 16 months or longer. No significant difference in the percentage of satellite cells was observed between the leg muscle of birds exposed to tritium for 4 months or longer and
