Editing tools There are many tools available for modifying your game files. When modifying a saved game, save files can be easily retrieved. As they can be created from almost any save game format, they are of little use in modifying games that are not using one of these formats. game lists can also be retrieved easily. The game will tell you what files are required to open a game, and which files are needed to download. As a specific example, the Football Manager 2012 Editor contains a "Save Game List" button in the game's interface, which can be used to select the save file to open in a special Editor. Some of the popular editors include: Downloadable content editors The other major type of modifications to a game comes in the form of downloading new game content, either as individual pieces of media or complete pack files, which together can be used to create a new game. Such packs usually contain the game's data files in a new format (to facilitate the management of the content), as well as pieces of original content. Most such packs are available on the official Football Manager website, and many of the files can be downloaded as individual files or via the upload tool, which requires a valid licence for some packs. These can include new clubs, managers, players, kits and stadiums, as well as all of the major and minor event calendars for the game. Packs are also updated through the patching service, though there is no official way to tell which patch contains new content. Traditionally, new content has been added in the form of a pack file, which is then downloaded to the manager's "manage" folder. A common complaint is that some packs contain content that is unfinished or of a poor quality, making it difficult to install such content or to keep the downloaded content properly organised. Another approach is to download separate content as individual pieces, which can then be patched into the existing game through the "download patches" button. It is not possible to create new teams, league or kits from these individual files. The files needed to create a new game are determined through the download process, which can be set to either "update files" or "edit files". If set to "update", the game will only need to download a few of the included files. These are defined by the "manage" folder itself, which is created automatically when the manager starts. It will contain all of the included files 4bc0debe42
